

I am appalled and angered that people are spending time and resources on this issue. The thing that the communications companies cannot say is that if comm. structures are restricted, than what would stop people from trying to restrict any structure from being built? My bedroom window has killed 3 birds so far this year. Multiply that number by the other three windows in my apartment, plus the two below me, and the three next to me, plus all other living structures in the US, and all of a sudden, a few towers seem insignificant. Without communications towers at thier current state, we can say goodbye to great cell phone coverage, radio penetration, and television transmission. I request that the FCC quit worrying about this, just because some people need a scapegoat for a few birds dying. Superior creatures wouldn't crash into the towers anyway.
